Sharon Burnham, Assistant United States Attorney, Roanoke, Virginia, for United States; James Turner, Pro Se Defendant.

The government has objected to any reduction in sentence for this defendant, who is eligible for such a reduction under 18 U.S.C. § 3582(c)(2) by virtue of the lowering of the crack cocaine guidelines.¹

I will overrule the government's objections.

The government's objections may be divided into three groups. First, the government emphasizes the conduct underlying the offense, including the amount of crack cocaine for which the defendant was responsible and the defendant's role in the offense. Second, the government points to the defendant's criminal history. Finally, the government contends that the defendant's behavior while incarcerated militates against a reduction.

The guidelines provide a vehicle for consideration of conduct underlying an offense. The defendant's Total Offense Level takes into account the amount of crack cocaine for which the defendant was responsible and the defendant's role in the offense. In this case, the defendant was held responsible for less than 500 grams of crack cocaine, in accord with his plea agreement. Upon the government's motion, the defendant received a three-level reduction for demonstrable acceptance of responsibility. The government later filed a Substantial Assistance Motion, which allowed the defendant to receive a further reduction in his sentence. The government has not offered any reason that the defendant should not continue to benefit from accepting responsibility and providing assistance to the government, and I cannot conceive of any reason why the defendant's commendable actions should bar him from receiving the benefit of a one-month sentence reduction.

With regard to the defendant's criminal history, the guidelines also provide a mechanism for consideration of prior convictions through calculation of a criminal history score. In this case, the defendant's criminal history put him in Category II and his guideline range was calculated accordingly. To do as the government suggests, would doubly penalize the defendant for his criminal history. Absent any evidence that the defendant's criminal history category uniquely fails to reflect his actual criminal history or danger to the public, I do not find his prior convictions to be a bar to reduction in sentence.

The government's final argument is that the defendant has behaved in such a manner in prison as to indicate that it would be dangerous to release him into the community. In the almost six years that the defendant has been incarcerated, he has been sanctioned for misconduct, including phone abuse, stealing, and disruptive conduct. I do not find that the defendant's post-sentencing conduct is significant enough to bar a one-month reduction of his sentence.

Infractions in prison can be serious and may indicate that a defendant will disregard the rules and laws of the community. Accordingly, the Bureau of Prisons has the discretion to grant or withhold good time, giving some inmates the opportunity to eliminate fifteen percent of the total sentence imposed by the court. Nothing in my ruling today changes that. If the Bureau of Prisons has determined that the defendant's infractions warrant a reduction in his good time, then the defendant may be required to serve the entirety of his new sentence in prison. Furthermore, if the government decides that deprivation of good time is an insufficient penalty for an infraction, then it has the option of prosecuting an inmate for the crimes he committed in prison.

A separate judgement will be entered.
